SYNOPSIS. Stuyvesant Perkins, an American trav- 'pro signo,' which rendered into Goreling in Germany, learns that his fortune has been lost, and starts on foot for Hwen-burg. While crossing the Bavarian fronof his resemblance to the king. Von Dun-kelheim persuades Perkins to assume his personality, in exchange for 2,500 marks. Ferkins is soon after arrested by the Pavarian police, for an offense committed by von Dunkelheim, and taken to Munich. He is informed that his supposed wife can obtain his release, but that she insists on his leaving the prison with her. He is allowed to obtain a look at her. She proves to be a large, elderly woman, of un-attractive appearance. Perkins is let out of prison that night. He escapes the wife, of prison that thint. He escapes the wife-von Dunkelhelm appearing and his wife-carrying him off by force in a carriage. Perkins falls asleep in the electric coupe of the king, and wakes in the king's room. for whom he has been mistaken, new press discontent in the chamber of deputies and among the royal guard. He declies to appease the latter by broaching for them an immense tun of beer at

"But we must pay for it, your majosty. Your uncle, the prince, as you know, is the chief owner of the company, and he draws a tight purse string. I doubt if he will give credit for it, Where, then, is the money to come

"Take," said I to the new secretary. Muller, "the price of this commodity at wholesale and figure out the value of the twenty-four thousand liters." "It is worth, your majesty," he answered, "about twelve pfennigs the liter, which would bring the value of the twenty-four thousand liters to about three thousand marks.' And what is the present muster of the royal guards?" I asked. "At present, sire, the number is something scant of three thousand." "Which would give," said I, "some-thing like eight litters of quarts to a This must satisfy them, or they are insatiate. As for the money, I will supply it from my own private purse. I have a sum equal to about three thousand marks in my escritoire. Take it Count you Lowenkopf, and use it in the manner I have pointed out. Let the guard be drawn in front of the brewery at four o'clock. Serve them each one of those large steins of balf a liter. As fast as they are served let them march up the Maximilian strasse, then upon the Residence strasse, past the chamber of deputies and around the Court garden strasse in front of my royal palace, and so, back to the Hof Brauerel. where they are to be again served with a half liter stein; and so on, until the great eask is empty. In this way there will be an endless procession of the royal guards upon these four streets for several hours. At the commencement of the ceremony you will post the Lusatian envoy extraordinary at a convenient window of the palace. whence he may look out upon the marching troops, take note of their loyalty and count their numbers. As they will pass the window sixteen times, it

My prime minister now took the order and the 3,000 marks, and, not withheim, of Munich, who informs Perkins out some trouble, bowed himself out of that he is anxious to disappear, on account the apartment. I immediately called Gottfried to me, and asked him about

The infortunate and lovely Valeska was valting for me but a few paces dis tant, while I was closely prisoned in my bedroom by that unfortunate laresse of the king and the non-arriva of the royal wardrobe. You are not as old, and you are infinitely more- I cannot express myself as I would wish, but I am almost sorry that you are a king." "We have to put up with the disadvantage of royalty," said I, "There are many inconveniences attached to the position. For instance, if a king wishes to marry, he cannot wed the maiden of his choice. He has nothing whatever to say about the matter, and his bride some ugly royal princess of a neighbor-ing state, is selected for him by his

I accompanied this remark with a tender glance, and she received it with the divinest of blushes. My interestng visitor now arose to go.

The senator does not make mention The senator does not make mention of any of the men of distinction who may have called at the Canton house during his stay in it. He dwells merely upon the pleasant way in which milmpertant callers were received. He it said, all of it, to the honor of the presented.

It had better not be inferred, from the trait of character thus illustrated in the sketches of the senator, that the possessor of it is a yielding, malle-able. Irresolute individual. It would able, freesolute individual, it would be a mistake to draw any such inference from the manifestations of democratic courtesy at Canton. Major McKinley is known to the American people as a man of explicit thought, determined purpose, and austree temper. He would not mislead anybody, or triffe with any visitor. If he promised to give that young Ohio chap a ised to give that young Ohio chap a place in the white house, or made a promise to the two Ohio soldiers that he would think of their pensions, we have not a doubt that he will keep his word. It is pleasing to know that we are to have next year a president who is not gruff in manner or discourtcoms toward any man.

At this time it seems worth while to he will shadow us, on our return to my aunt's house."

"The execrable scoundrel!" I exclaimed. I shall, myself, accompany you to your aunt's house, and the order shall immediately thereafter, be put into execution. I shall take you have in my own coupe, and it will be an unlucky day for the baron, if he crosses our path."

At this time it seems worth while to chiphasize the remark that Major Mc-Kinley does not obtrude the trait spoken of by Senator Lodge because he has anything to gain from the exhibition of it. He is not now a candidate for the presidency; he is not seeking for votes. He will hold his place, if he shall live, until March of the first year of the next century. There are plenty of noliticians who, when running for an office, are wonderr path."
"Your majesty is everything that is dole and sweet and generous," cried catch the voters. If successful in the election, how top-lofty they sometime show themselves after it, if defeate how sulky they are! Major McKinle gained a wonderful victory last month and yet he is no more stuck-up that he was at any previous time in his life. There are other Ohio men of whom that could not be said if they were in his place.

The question arises whether Major McKinley will be both provided and resolute during the whole of his term of officeat Washington. The office is one that I intended to take the ladies to ways concillatory and always fullex their house in my horseless coupe, and lible in the right, never ungracious and never intractable, faithful to his trust
